

Most U.S. jurisdictions permit in-house counsel licensed in other U.S. jurisdictions to represent their in-state employers, often through a registration or certification process (registered in-house counsel), but many do not permit them to provide pro bono services. When they do, the practice rules typically include difficult and unnecessary restrictions that limit and discourage registered in-house counsel's pro bono participation. Across the U.S., in-house counsel have been advocating to change these rules.

How MJP Rules Impact Pro Bono

Multijurisdictional practice rules pose a significant obstacle for many in-house attorneys participating in pro bono activities. Registered in-house counsel and their colleagues serve as a vital untapped resource when considering that 80% of the legal needs of low-income Americans go unmet.

"Why is it that as lawyers we can provide legal services to our corporations, yet somehow we are not qualified to help people who are in need?"

Rules in these jurisdictions do not include unnecessary restrictions on registered in-house counsel providing pro bono.

Mapping In-House Rights

Registered in-house counsel may provide pro bono legal services:

- broadly, subject to the local professional rules of conduct;
 - only in association with an approved legal services organization or with the supervision of a locally licensed attorney;
 - only in association with an approved legal services organization;
 - only in association with an approved legal services organization and with the supervision of a locally licensed attorney;
 - pursuant to an out-of-state lawyer pro bono rule, subject to a number of restrictions.

Progress Made

In July 2012, the Conference of Chief Justices and Conference of State Court Administrators adopted Resolution 11, which states:

"Be it resolved that the Conference of Chief Justices and the Conference of State Court Administrators encourage their members to consider promoting the expansion of pro bono legal services, including by amending the practice rules to allow non-locally licensed in-house counsel who are permitted to work for their employer to also provide pro bono legal services subject to the local rules of professional conduct."
